Dr. Garnett Studies Rural Health in Virginia

Blacksburg.- Increased operating costs in hospitals . . reflected in increased charges . . make hospital care almost out of reach of people in ordinary circumstances, even though incomes of such people have increased.

This fact is pointed up in a study covering 57 years and called "the road to health in rural Virginia," recently compiled by Dr. W. E. Garnett, rural sociologist at VPI Agricultural Experiment Station.

The patient's worry about costs is being lessened by hospital and other types of insurance, but less than half of the medical school hospital inpatients have insurance. The present scale of hospital room charges is $14 for ward patients and up to $20 for private patients, plus $10 per 8-hour day for private nurses when needed, plus doctors' fees.

Dr. Garnett's study points up other problems, in the medical field. Rising costs of all types of supplies and services, as well as unpaid bills make it hard to avoid hospital deficits. In little more than a decade the working house of nurses and orderlies have been reduced from 12 to 8, and hourly pay rates have greatly increased. The demands of orderlies and other operative help are now enforced by unions.

There is an acute and growing shortage of nurses, a shortage produced by the growing need for nurses in many fields; by the competition of other lines of employment giving better pay and requiring less training; and by the reduction in the number of nursing schools because small hospitals cannot meet modern training requirements. There are only 34 accredited nursing schools in the state as compared with over 60 a few decades ago.

Dr. Garnett says nursing education needs to be more generally supported from public funds, as are other types of education. The two medical schools in Virginia now have 30 $100-a-year state-provided scholarships for nurses. This help is not available in private hospitals.

Long, expensive training, with delayed earnings, means that young doctors, many of whom have incurred debits for their training,, must seek locations which offer promise of a good income. Fortunately, Dr. Garnett says, medical schools have available several scholarships, but not nearly enough. Furthermore, despite all the medical schools can do, the expensive training and limited professional life-expectancy tend to make young doctors materialistically minded.

The great growth of medical knowledge in recent decades has brought a need and an opportunity for specialization. This trend will undoubtedly continue although medical schools put increasing emphasis on the opportunities for general practice and are giving better training in that field.

Dr. Garnett says medical schools are interested in the problem of more adequate medical care for rural people—a need they are trying to meet in such ways as stressing opportunities in rural practice, and providing internships in rural hospitals. Good results are expected from the 20 rural medical scholarships given each medical school year by the state. These provide $1,000 per year and require one year of rural practice for each year of aid. Areas to which these students are assigned are determined by the State Department of Health. There are five similar scholarships yearly for Negro students who train in out-of-state medical schools. Four dental scholarships are also given by the state.

Changes in medical training and technique necessitate changes in practice procedures for which both doctors and the public have responsibilities, Dr. Garnett claims. This is especially true in the field of rural practice.

He poses several questions. (1) Are doctors trained to be open minded enough about the desirability of possible changes in the medical-care system, and their leadership responsibilities in this field as they are trained to be open-minded about changes in medical techniques? (2) As a means of off-setting materialistic trends, should the doctor - training program give greater stress to the service motive in medicine? If so, in order that doctors may have a better understanding of social forces and conditions, (3) should not social science courses be required in students' pre-medical training? Such courses are not found in Virginia's two medical schools.

Dr. Garnett points out that if schools are starved for proper financial support, they suffer from inadequate facilities, equipment, staff and research programs . . weakness later reflected in their output. Furthermore, students and interns are required to make laboratory tests and perform other services beyond the point of diminishing - learning returns, when they could use their time more profitably.

Juvenile Crime Increasing Fast

Juvenile crime statistics are terrifying. Well over a million youngsters are picked up by police every year, 435,000 are brought to court, more than 100,000 held in jail, and 40,000 sent to training schools. And it isn't just the big city slums that breed crime. Delinquency is increasing faster in small and medium-sized towns than in big ones. Crime can breed in the country club section as well as in the slums.

Bulbs for spring flowers which will be available from now to December should be planted as soon as possible after they are received.

A. G. Smith, Jr., associate horticulturist at VPI, says a good bulb has one or more minature flowers with all the leaves in its center with food packed around it. All the gardener has to do is plant it in well-drained soil where the bulb can make roots and take up water and a small amount of fertilizer. Nature does the rest. Use no manure for bulbs at planting time, and use fertilizers with great care. Chemicals should be mixed thoroughly with the soil so the roots will not be injured. Some fertilizer can be worked into the top soil after the bulbs are planted.

As a rule, rats, mice or other rodents do not eat the bulbs of daffodils, hyacinths, or crocus. Rabbits love the leaves of crocus and often kill them by cutting the tops off close to the ground.

Rodents do eat the bulbs of tulips dutch iris, and lilies if they find them when they need food. The greatest losses will occur near old fields and wooded areas.

Deep planting may reduce rodent damage. In sandy soils, where water cannot stand, tulips may be planted 8 to 10 inches deep. Under average conditions, tulips, hyacinths, and daffodils should be planted about 6 inches deep, and dutch iris about 5 inches. Small bulbs, such as crocus, scilla, grape hyacinths (muscaro) and snowdrops may be planted 2 to 3 inches deep.

Paper-white narcissus should be put on gravel in water, or in soil in pots as soon as received. If kept in a cool, dark place until the roots are well developed, they should begin blooming by Christmas or January. Put in light before the tops get tall.
